Reduce Stress by Playing Outside

As our children are acclimating back into their school routines, they may be feeling some stress. It's easy to get stressed about the morning rush to get to school, making so many choices about clothing and food, not feeling confident about how to do school work, or getting along with peers. At the end of a hard day, how do our kids relieve some of these stressors? The best way is to get outdoors!

Being outside in the woods or in nature is a natural stress reducer because the setting is calm and peaceful. Nature has been proven to elevate our mood and calm our nerves. Physical activity outside gives us natural endorphins and can even improve focus. Playtime outside at the end of the school day is a perfect way for children to transition from school to home and balance out their emotions from the day.

In this day and age, though, we have to remind our kids to get outside and get moving instead of plopping down in front of the TV. So, I'd recommend kicking them out of the house once in a while and encouraging them to go play! (And as it turns out, we adults could benefit from being outside with them too). They are guaranteed to feel better afterwards and so are you!

Hope you all had a happy first week of school and worked through those first day jitters!
